Both Swedens school system and its labor market authorities have long emphasized vocational counseling and guidance. In recent years, such services have expanded and a new transition system was introduced in 1973--the SYO system (Education and Work Orientation System). The SYO provides for coordination and cooperation between the education and labor market authorities. Full-time vocational counselors are employed in all educational institutions. Counseling begins at about age 13 and is supplemented by practical work orientation. In the eighth grade, a week is allocated for group visits to factories and offices, while in the ninth (the last grade of compulsory school), pupils spend 2 weeks in various work places. Beginning in 1977, pupils in ninth grade started to do much more actual work in firms--from 6 to 10 weeks. One of the distinctive features of the SYO system is the emphasis on the needs of disadvantaged youth and special provision...
