These intersecting street also be employed in blocks devoted to business or manufacturing purposes, unless special reasons apply. For certain whole block may be used. One of the objections made to the plan of upper New York is that the main streets are so close that sufficient continuous building space is not always available. The reserve area in the center of each unit will cover about 18 acres. Details of a unit area are shown in Fig. 2; details of blocks are shown in Figs. 3 and 4. It is, however, underground Protopolis that embodies the most radical departure from established methods. No resident of a large city needs to be reminded of the expense and annoyance due to the underground systems necessary in modern life. The complex and extensive network of pipes and wires represents an enormous capitalization for initial construction and a still greater capitalization for the Fig. 3. extension and repairs. It must also seem to many that the practice of excavating large areas for house use and yet leaving the street prism undisturbed, except when underground systems are to be installed, is most wasteful. It must be borne in mind that the dangerous and disfiguring overhead electric systems are entirely due to the cost that the excavation of the street prism involves. The simple remedy is to build up from the established datum instead of digging into it. The entire city should be, so to speak, on...
